

Growth through Site Development

On my "Blog Categories" page (which you can access here), I explained what I mean by "Growth" in the context of balancing what I regard as the four, major areas of human life: "Growth," "Love," "Work," and "Play." I mentioned that by my standards, continuing education can qualify as a form of such growth.

The process of working with my wife, Cherita, over the last, several weeks to create and develop this Living Action web site has been an educational one, one that's certainly contributed to my growth. I know that this process will continue, as I make further use of this site and engage in more dialogue with others. I've learned how to use software features with which I was previously unfamiliar, and I've learned how to sharpen my expression by making use of the distinctive features with which a web site is especially well equipped.

Most of all, though, I feel indebted in this context to my outstanding teacher: my wife, Cherita, who has patiently assisted me in innumerable ways, not only by teaching me how to make use of this web site, but also by collaborating with me in the creation of other web sites, in the past.

Thank you for being you, Cherita! I love you! <kiss> :-)
